Welcome

We are pleased to welcome you in Warsaw, to this year's EARLI SIG5-Learning and Development in Early Childhood and SIG28-Play, Learning and Development conference with the theme 'Fostering empathy, creativity and resilience for a sustainable future'.

We live in uncertain and dynamically changing circumstances. The increasing number of armed conflicts forcing migration that challenges especially refugees but also host communities, the consequences of the COVID pandemic, climate change and the development of artificial intelligence are shaping a new context for children's development. This context requires a special effort on the part of researchers, professionals, policymakers and society as a whole to create conditions that foster the empathy, resilience and creativity of children, without which these challenges cannot be met. We hope to meet with you in Warsaw to exchange research findings, experiences and reflections on this topic. Together we stand a better chance of facing this issue.

At this EARLI SIG5 and SIG28 conference, we are hosting three distinguished keynote speakers.
Angela Pyle – Associate Professor, Dr. Eric Jackman Institute of Child Study, OISE, University of Toronto. Her research interest is in child development and early primary education.
Maciej Karwowski – Professor at the Institute of Psychology, University of Wroclaw. His research interests are creativity, educational assessment, educational leadership and special education.
Heidi Lesscher – Associate Professor at Universiteit Utrecht, behavioural neuroscientist, expert in addiction and play research.

Within single paper sessions, 53 papers will be presented. Furthermore, during ten symposia, 34 papers will be discussed. Moreover, during the poster session, 10 posters will be presented.

Title: Expanding conceptions of play-based learning: promising paths and pedagogical challenges

Research examining play-based learning has shared both promising and problematic findings. There is great promise in the improved learning of children in controlled studies comparing play-based learning to traditional didactic instruction. This promise is counterbalanced by inconsistent findings and dichotomous recommendations for implementation. Many have theorized about the causes of these challenges, including problematizing the lack of agreement and continuing debates surrounding definitions of play-based learning, including the problematic position that adults do not belong in children's play. This presentation will outline the impact of this research on educational practice and consider the lessons researchers could learn from classroom realities. Data from a decade of studies in Canadian classrooms will be used to support the examination of what we know about play-based learning, what we still need to learn, and how teachers are negotiating these complexities in their practice.

Title: Healthy play better coping: An interdisciplinary perspective on play

Abstract:

Play is considered essential for the healthy social, emotional and cognitive development of individuals. A lot of our current knowledge about the impact of play on the development of brain and behaviour stems from play research in rats. We know that rats that were isolated during the stage of their lives in which they play most, essentially depriving them of social play behaviour, develop reduced and dysfunctional social behaviour, enhanced anxiety-like behaviour and impaired cognitive control. Our recent studies on social play in rats have shown for example that individual variations in social play in rats predict the resilience to loss of control over substance use. Moreover, I will show data for rats that were allowed to play in a more risky environment, which resulted in greater cognitive control and corresponding long-lasting changes in the functioning of the prefrontal cortex.

In my lecture I will also discuss how these findings translate to humans and what the implications are of restrictions in play, for example for children that suffer from a chronic disease.

Title: Feedback for Creativity

Creativity is a skill that can be cultivated; indeed, numerous creativity training programs have proven effective in enhancing the creative thinking abilities of children, adolescents, and adults. Among the crucial elements that drive this learning process is the feedback people receive. However, despite its importance, our understanding of how feedback influences creativity and what types of feedback are most effective is quite limited. This talk delves into the role of feedback for creative thought and action by discussing recent research from the creativity literature, including a unique large-scale naturalistic experiment on almost 40,000 participants. It further shows how and when feedback works or doesn't work, what types of feedback are particularly beneficial, and when pseudofeedback can lead to losing creative chances.
